Trapped with no heat, no water, and no radio the group decides to wait it out. Help will come. It has to. Until it doesn't. And Matt knows if they wait any longer they'll be dead—just another bunch of victims in Mother Nature's twisted games. Armed with only a handful of supplies and his fierce determination Matt decides to go head-to-head with the elements, battling hypothermia, frostbite, and even mountain lions in order to find help and save them all. That is if Mother Nature doesn't kill him first.

Gr 9 Up—An avalanche turns out to be the least of their worries as one mishap after another befalls a group of young adults. High school senior Matt wasn't supposed to go to Colorado for spring break with his best friend, Tony. But Matt's dad, as usual, bails on him, so the guys meet up with Tony's older brother and his friends to party and ski. When an avalanche kills one person and incapacitates another, the narrative moves among Matt's rescue party, those tending to the injured person, and the mountain lion hunting the unaware humans. Any one of the ensuing calamities would take a miracle to survive, but adventure stories require the suspension of disbelief. Braun's cinematic descriptions place readers in the middle of the action, while touches of humor and contemplation about life and family issues will keep them interested in the characters. Strong, smart Leah is the most compelling one to watch and learn from. This is an easy read, but language, alcohol, and mild drug use might make this more appropriate for an older audience. VERDICT Purchase where there is high demand for adventure tales. —Elissa Cooper, Helen Plum Memorial Library, Lombard, IL

Braun intersperses the nail-biting suspense with humor and depth. Her realistically varied characters never fall into stock characterization, and shifting points of view, including that of a mountain lion, add compelling perspective and drive the plot forward. With accessible, propulsive writing, this survival adventure tale will be a hit with a broad audience. — (Booklist) Braun's cinematic descriptions place readers in the middle of the action, while touches of humor and contemplation about life and family issues will keep them interested in the characters. (School Library Journal) Braun is talented at describing suspenseful threats, such as the steady approach of a mountain lion that realizes that injury makes a human easy prey. Just the ticket for readers who like hearty doses of suspenseful adventure. (Kirkus) dead—just another bunch of victims in Mother Nature’s twisted games. Armed with only a handful of supplies and his fierce determination Matt decides to go head-to-head with the elements, battling hypothermia, frostbite, and even mountain lions in order to find help and save them all. That is if Mother Nature doesn’t kill him first. Avalanche is a quick and easy read. Once the nominal event occurs, the action is constant. There is no end to the deadly situations these kids can get themselves into. Don’t get me wrong, I enjoyed it, but in the same way I enjoy an action movie; if it’s exciting, I’m on board. Some suspension of logic is required, especially after the second time Matt nearly gets himself killed by behaving recklessly. By the point that he should have been dead for a third time, I was beginning to wonder why Leah didn’t just do him in herself. Then Leah, levelheaded, mountain savvy Leah, does something that even a newbie like myself knows you’re not supposed to do, and nearly gets them both killed. The author could have easily written the scene without throwing one of her few sensible characters under the bus, but chose not to. That’s just bad parenting. Honestly, this isn’t a bad book. The reader can tell that Ms. Braun did some good research, and that is nothing to ignore; it’s the one feature that takes this from being a mediocre book to being a pretty good read. I would recommend Avalanche to readers 12 and older who enjoy action and adventure.

Stung by yet another snub by his professor father, this time because Dad’s 28 year old girlfriend is having pregnancy issues, Matt is eager to go from Des Moines to Colorado on a school break. Smart and having an eclectic mind, He’s not wise in the ways of survival or girls, two areas where skills will soon have plenty of value. He and his best friend Toby have been invited by Toby’s older brother Sid to join a group of college age kids on a backcountry skiing adventure. It’s an interesting group. In addition to Matt, Toby and Sid, there’s Dylan, wealthy and somewhat reckless, his girlfriend Julie, and Sid’s sibling roommates, Carter and Leah. Matt and Toby aren’t novices, but skiing at 11,000 feet, while going uphill as much as down tests them right from the start. When an avalanche hits, burying Dylan and seriously injuring Sid, everyone’s strength and mental stability are tested. The party must decide who goes for help (there’s no cellphone service at the abandoned cabin where they seek shelter) and who stays with Sid. How that’s decided and what happens to each group make for a fast and tension-filled read. You might criticize some of the decisions made at times, but unless you’ve been in an unpredictable and life-threatening crisis yourself, it’s easy to play armchair quarterback. I really enjoyed the book and think teen adventure junkies will as well. Yes, there's strong language and drinking, but both are typical of college age characters.

Entertaining story. Some of the events were pretty far-fetched, but held my interest. Most importantly, all the characters were likeable and "real". I would not call this a "teen" book, but definitely "young adult". That being said I'm 61 years old and enjoyed the story. Warning: Sexual references, drinking, drugs and violent paragraphs.

This was a great read. I was angry at the way some of the events turned, but that's why it was so good - not predictable! Nice length, very fast paced.
